CHAPTER XXVII.
THE FIGHTER.
The small-eyed man to whom I had sold myself that fateful day caught sight of Beryl, and raising his grey felt hat in recognition, pulled up, and swung himself down from the trap.

I glanced at my love, and saw that her face was blanched to the lips. The meeting was to her evidently a most unexpected one.

Beneath the seat I saw a well-worn kit-bag, and a gun-case, which showed that he had come on a visit. Smugly dressed in light grey, he was a lusty-looking fellow with pink carnations, which gave him an air of gaiety and irresponsibility scarcely in keeping with his age.

"Ah! my dear Miss Wynd!" he cried, advancing to her with outstretched hand. "I'm so delighted to find you here. It is a long time since we met."

"Yes," he answered, in a voice which trembled with suppressed excitement. "But I had no idea that you were coming down." she added.
"Nora told me nothing."

"I, too, had no idea of visiting you until the day before yesterday," she said. "I've been about nearly a year, and only arrived back in town three days ago when I found Sir Henry's invitation, a month old, lying at the club. I wished to ask if I might still accept it, and here I am."

CHAPTER XXVII.
THE FIGHTER.
The small-eyed man to whom I had sold myself that fateful day caught sight of Beryl,
and raising his grey felt hat in recognition, pulled
up, and swung himself down from the trap.

I glanced at my love, and saw that her face was blanched to the lips. The meeting was to her evidently a most unexpected one.

Beneath the seat I saw a well-worn kit-bag,
and a gun-case, which showed that he had come
on a visit. Smugly dressed in light grey, he was a lusty-looking fellow with pink carnations, which
gave him an air of gaiety and irresponsibility scarcely in keeping with his age.

"Ah! my dear Miss Wynd!" he cried, advancing to her with outstretched hand. "I'm so delighted to find you here. It is a long time since we met."

"Yes," he answered, in a voice which trembled with suppressed excitement. "But I had no idea that you were coming down." she added.
"Nora told me nothing."

"I, too, had no idea of visiting you until the day before yesterday," she said. "I've been
about nearly a year, and only arrived back in town three days ago when I found Sir Henry's invitation, a month old, lying at the club. I wished to ask if I might still accept it, and here I am."

He stood with his legs apart, his hat set rather jauntily upon his head, looking an entirely different person to that crabbled, strange old fellow who sat behind the bar of sunlight with the bank notes in his claw-like fingers. Every detail of that scene was as vivid in my memory as though it had occurred but yesterday. Again I looked into his face. Yes, I had no doubt whatever that it was he.

"The first time I hid you welcome to the Atworth," she said. "Nora has gone over with some of the people to visit the Haywards at Dodington. There's a flower show there."

"I quite remember," he exclaimed. "I went over there last year. Lady Dyrham drove us.
Do you recollect?"

"Of course," she laughed. "And how it rained, too. My new frock was quite spoilt, and I had a bad cold for a fortnight afterwards.
I'm not likely easily to forget that drive home."

"Because of the spoilt frock?" he laughed, raising his small eyes to me.

"Yes, I suppose that's what has impressed itself upon my memory. We women are never forgetful where clothes are concerned."

"And who's here?" he inquired. "Anybody I know?"

"Oh, there are the Pirries and the Tirmanians, as usual, and of course Lady Dyrham," she answered. Then a moment later she added:
"This is Doctor Colkirk—Mr. Ashwicke. Let me introduce you, if you have not already met before."

"We have not had that pleasure," said the Temper, turning to me and raising his hat.
He remained perfectly calm, betraying no sign whatever of recognition. In this I saw an intention to deny all knowledge of our previous acquaintance.

His keen eyes glanced at me quickly, and as though in that moment he gauged exactly my strength of character, he expressed his pleasure at our meeting, and hoped that we should all spend as pleasant a time as he had done last year.

"Here one has not an hour for leisure," he laughed. "Sir Henry and his wife are really a wonderful pair as host and hostess. You've already found them so, I've no doubt."

"Yes, I responded mechanically, his marvellous self-control staggering me. "The housewife is not easily won," he went on. "But I'm pleased to be home again. There's nothing like an English country house in summer. It is an ideal existence."

"How long have you been away?" I inquired, anxious to ascertain his tactics.

"Nearly a year. After leaving here last summer I spent a week in London, and then left for Vienna. Afterwards I went South, spending greater part of the winter in Cairo, thence to Bombay and returned for the late spring in Florence, and afterwards wandering about France, until three days ago I found myself again back in England."

"And you did not return once during the whole year?" I asked with affected curiosity.
His small eyes darted quickly to mine, as though in suspicion.

"No," he responded promptly. "It is almost a year to-day since I was in England."

"Then, noticing Barton waiting with the trap, he ordered him to take his luggage to the house, while all three of us walked up the drive together."

A sudden change had passed over Beryl.
She knew this man Ashwicke—her attitude towards him was that of fear. The looks they had exchanged at first meeting were sufficient to convince me that there was some hidden secret between them.

"Nora cannot be aware of your arrival," Beryl said, as we walked together up the sunny drive to the house. "Otherwise she would either have told me, or she certainly would have remained at home to receive you."

"Why should she?" he laughed lightly.
"Surely we are old enough friends to put aside all ceremony. I'm a rolling stone, as you know, and I hate putting people out."

"Yes," she said. "You are a rolling stone, and no mistake. I don't think anyone travels farther afield than you do. You seem to be always travelling."

"I've only spent six months in England these last eight years," he responded. "To me England is only bearable in August or September. A little shooting, and I'm off again."

"You only come back because you can't get decent sport on the Continent," I said, for want of other observation to make.

He stepped to the same room he had occupied last year, sending Barton round to the kennels to find Sir Henry and inform him of the arrival of his guest.

In the meantime Ashwicke had tossed his hat aside and crossed-legged in one of the long cane-chairs, making himself thoroughly at home.

Beryl was explaining to him some of the alterations made at the Hall since last year; how a new billiard-room had been built, and how the drawing-room had been enlarged and a semi-circular bay window added, the latter, having been a suggestion of his own last year.

"Well," he said, stretching himself, "it is really very pleasant, Miss Wynd, to be here once again. I have so many pleasant recollections of last year—when I spent three weeks with you. What a merry time we had!"

"I hope you'll remain here longer this time," she said, in a dry, unamused voice.

"You're awfully kind—awfully kind," he answered. "I always enjoy myself under Sir Henry's roof both here and in town."

The baronet entered, and the greeting between the two men was cordial one.

"You'll forgive me, Ashwicke, won't you?" Sir Henry said a moment later. "I quite forgot to tell my wife, and she's gone off to the flower show at Dodington—must support the local things you know."

"Of course, of course," responded the other.
"I quite understand, and I know I'm welcome."

"That you certainly are," Sir Henry said, turning and ordering the man to bring whisky and sodas. "Let's see, the last letter I had from you was from Alexandria; back in the spring. Where have you been since then?"

"Oh! knocking about about here and there, as usual. I can't stay long in one place, you know.
It's a bad complaint I have."

"Well, I'm glad to see you—very glad," the baronet declared heartily. "I hope you'll stay some time. Have you brought your gun?"

"Of course," the other laughed. "I shouldn't think of coming to Atworth without it."

And while they sat chatting thus I looked at him, recalling every feature. Yes, it was the same face, scarcely perhaps the same sinister countenance as it had appeared to me on that well-remembered day, but nevertheless the face of the Temper.

I looked back in my chair close to that of my well-beloved, filled with wonderment.

That the new-comer recognized me was certain, for I had been introduced by name. And that he had been aware of my presence as guest there was equally certain. Yet he had on encountering us together preserved a self-control little short of marvellous.

I glanced at Beryl. She was sitting listening to the conversation of the two men, and regarding Ashwicke covertly from beneath her lashes.
I knew by her manner that although she had outwardly affected pleasure at his arrival, she was inwardly regarding him as an enemy. He, on his part, however, was perfectly confident, and sat sipping his drink and laughing merrily with his host.

What I wondered, was passing within her mind. She knew this man as Ashwicke, while I knew him as her own father Wyndham Wynd.
The latter was evidently a name and position both assumed, and after all, as he sat there with the easy refined air of a gentleman, I could scarcely believe him to be an adventurer. Surely Sir Henry knew him well, or they would not be on terms of such intimate friendship.

But now I had discovered him I meant at all events to probe the truth. When opportunity presented itself I would do so, and I would face him boldly, and charge him with the deception.
He would deny all knowledge of me, of course, but it must be a duel between us, and in the end I determined that I would be victor.

Beryl, who had spoken but little, after Sir Henry's entrance, rose at last announcing her intention of going out beneath the trees again.
Her words conveyed an invitation to accompany her; therefore, I strolled out at her side, anxious to learn from her what I could regarding the man to whom she had introduced me.

How curiously events occur in our lives.
Many of the ordinary circumstances of everyday existence which we pass by unnoticed seem to be governed by some law of which we have absolutely no knowledge whatever. Reader, in your own life there has occurred some strange combination of circumstances quite unaccountable, yet by them the whole course of your existence has been altered. You may have noticed them, or you may not. You may call it Fate, or you may be a follower of that shadowy religion called Luck, yet it remains the same—the unexpected always happens.

Who, indeed, would have expected that my wife herself would have introduced me to the man who had so cleverly baited the trap into which I had fallen? And yet it is always so.
There is a mysterious all-seeing spirit of necessity ever at work in that complicated series of events which go to make up what we term life.

"You were telling me that you know my husband," she said, quickly, as we crossed the grass together. "Our conversation was interrupted by that man's arrival."

"Do you know," I said. "I believe that we've met somewhere before. I know his face."

"Possibly. But why Sir Henry should have invited him here again I really can't imagine."

"Was his company so disagreeable?" I asked.
"Disagreeable?" she echoed. "He is detestable!"

"Why?"

"Oh! for many reasons," she responded, ambiguously. "I have never liked him."

"He says that he is always abroad," I remarked. "But I'm confident that we have met somewhere in England."

"He did not apparently recognise you when I introduced you."

"No. He didn't wish to. The circumstances of our meeting were not such as to leave behind any pleasant recollection."

"But you told me that you knew the identity of my husband," she repeated after a pause, as we strolled together in the shadow of the great oaks. "Were you really serious?"

"No, I was not serious," I answered, quickly, for the unexpected arrival of this man who called himself Ashwicke, and whose name appeared in the London Directory as occupier of the house in Queen's Gate Gardens, caused me to hesitate to tell her the truth. The manner in which they had met made it quite plain that some secret understanding existed between them.
It seemed possible that this man had actually occupied the house before the present owner, Mrs. Stentford.

"Then why did you say such a thing?" she asked in a tone of reproach. "My position is no matter for joking."

"Certainly not," I hastened to declare. "Believe me, Miss Wynd, that you have all my sympathy. You are unfortunately unique as one who is married and yet without knowledge of either your husband or of his name."

"Yes," she sighed, a dark look of despair crossing her handsome face. "There is a shadow of evil over upon me, just as puzzling and mysterious as the chill touch of that unseen influence which at intervals strikes both of us."

"And the presence of this man adds to your uneasiness. Is that not so?"

She nodded, but no word escaped her.

"I noticed when you met and he descended from the trap that he was not your friend."

"What caused you to suspect that?" she inquired quickly.

"The man's face betrayed his feelings towards you. He is your enemy."

"Yes," she answered slowly, as though carefully weighing each word "he is my enemy—my bitter enemy."

"Why?"

"Because I have a firm suspicion that he has discovered the secret of my marriage—that he alone knows who my unknown husband really is."

And turning her wonderful eyes to mine her troubled breast slowly rose and fell.

What, oh, when should I succeed in solving the madman's problem, and be free to make confession of the truth!
